Christina Braver writes steamy, small-town, contemporary romance set in the Pacific Northwest. Her stories are about strong heroes with softer sides, independent heroines with a bit of sass, and the guaranteed happily-ever-after we all need.

She has a master's in clinical psychology and uses that knowledge to create well rounded character driven stories described as "a little bit nerdy and a little bit dirty." Influenced by books and information from prominent sex therapists, her novels bring toe curling spice and real-life sexy tips, as well as address deeper issues such as women's sexual health and sex positivity for everyone.

When she isn't writing, Christina can be found laughing too loudly with friends, sipping wine, or reading. She lives outside Seattle with her husband who shares his bourbon, and two teenagers who don't tell their friends what Mom writes.

Question Suggestions:

Ask me anything, and I'll try to answer, but here are some ideas:

- Why do you write steamy romance?
- How have romance novels changed in recent years?
- Where do you get your ideas for the sex scenes? Hint: they aren't autobiographical.
- What is involved in self-publishing a book?
- What perspectives or ideas have you challenged with your work?
